CFaR Researcher Needs Member Help with Survey

You are invited to participate in a study that will gather information about the current condition assessment practices and decision-making processes followed by your organization, as well as the identification of the significant criteria used in your building maintenance decisions.

This study is a part of a Ph.D. dissertation study conducted in the Civil and Environmental Engineering and Construction Management departments at Colorado State University. The main purpose of the study is to develop a condition assessment framework and a decision-making model to support effective repair and replacement decisions for building maintenance in the institutions of higher education.

We welcome your participation in this study and need your thoughts and opinions in order to improve facility management practices for higher educational facilities. The survey will take about 10-15 minutes to complete. Additional information concerning your participation in this study is provided in the consent. We are happy to provide additional details upon request if needed.

The deadline for the survey is February 15, 2019. Click here to take the survey.

5 Ways to Rethink Traditional Mentoring

When great leaders reflect on their careers, many attribute their success to the same key decision: finding a mentor. That's because mentorships, when done well, help mentees both develop personally and advance professionally. In a recent Quartz survey conducted on behalf of JPMorgan Chase, 83 percent of people said that having a mentor helped them move up in their career.

Yet despite the near-universal praise for mentoring, it's clear that the classic mentor model is far from a one-size-fits-all. Explore five mentorship models you might not have considered before.
